Questioned by reporters as he left a House committee hearing, Baker said "no," when asked about the bond decline, adding that it was a reflection of concern about the possibility of a trade war. "It is what the markets think would be the adverse consequences of a trade war." He said the administration was concerned that protectionism would lead to international trade problems adding that he thought the action against the Japanese was still consistent with this policy. Iran's leadership had pledged a decisive breakthrough in the 6-1/2-year-long war in the Persian year -- which ended yesterday -- and mounted a major offensive towards Iraq's second city of Basra, on the southern front, in January. Iraq has never given any casualty figures but Hussein conceded they were high. "It was clear to all of us the fighting this time would be long and
